Wealthy old Henry K. Chisel, who has the gout, orders his daughter, Amy, to keep an appointment with Percy, the man he has chosen to be her husband. She detests the sleek and slender dressed up scoundrel and is determined to marry Horace Sledge, whom she meets on the street.

Percy meets them and pokes Horace in the jaw for gallivanting with his fiance, but Horace bests him in a series of lucky manouvers ending in the flight of Percy on an ice wagon hook. Horace marries Amy and they go to break the news to her father. He has just kicked out the butler for stepping on his gouty foot and phoned the employment agency for another. She is afraid to tell him during his rage and the presence of Horace is explained when he is announced as the new butler.

He puts on the Butler's uniform and admits Percy who has come to call on Amy. The bull dog, playing with the old man's gout bandage, drags him outside and into a stream. In the excitement Percy is left alone in the house. The old man returns in time to see the butler shaking Percy down. A shower of family silver falls from his clothes. Percy is arrested and the new son-in-law introduces himself as the old man's western representative.
